

CHAPTER ONE

The Ledger

He wrote in a hand so small that the pages seemed to contain no writing at all until you brought a lamp close to them.

It was a small thing, the way a hand hesitates over a measure, and yet it travelled through the households faster than any announcement.

Everything in the settlement passed through those pages eventually: the debts, the marriages, the goats sold at the crossroads market.

Afterwards there was the usual argument about whether the road had been badly built or merely badly maintained—a distinction that mattered enormously to the two men who had built it.

The rains came late that year, and the whole valley waited for them with the patience of people who have waited before.

Nobody in the settlement said so aloud, but the elders had begun to measure the grain differently, and the children noticed.

The truth was more ordinary. He wrote because the writing steadied him, the way other men were steadied by walking or by prayer.

In the fourth month the rains arrived all at once, without ceremony, and washed a section of the eastern road entirely away.

By the second week of the dry spell the river had narrowed to a bright thread, and the women walked further each morning to reach it.

“You write too much,” his wife told him, not unkindly, and he answered that a thing unwritten is a thing already half forgotten.

He wrote in a hand so small that the pages seemed to contain no writing at all until you brought a lamp close to them.

The government surveyor came in a truck the colour of dust and stayed three days, measuring things that everyone already knew the size of.

The rains came late that year, and the whole valley waited for them with the patience of people who have waited before.

By the second week of the dry spell the river had narrowed to a bright thread, and the women walked further each morning to reach it.

Nobody in the settlement said so aloud, but the elders had begun to measure the grain differently, and the children noticed.

CHAPTER SIX

What Was Measured

Nobody in the settlement said so aloud, but the elders had begun to measure the grain differently, and the children noticed.

The government surveyor came in a truck the colour of dust and stayed three days, measuring things that everyone already knew the size of.
